

At a Glance | August 22, 2019

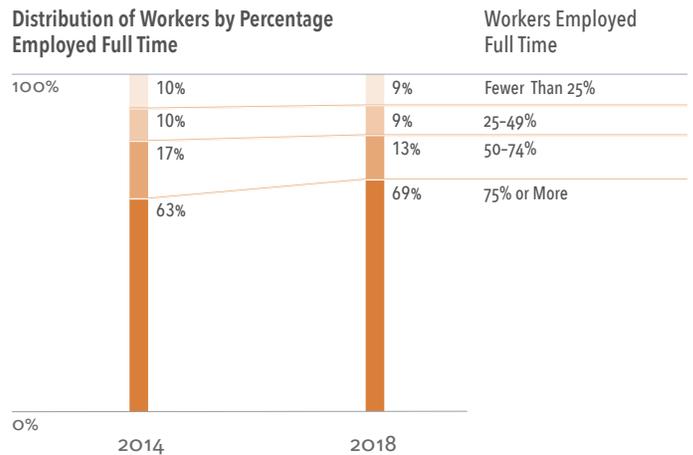

Why Are More Workers Eligible for Health Coverage When Fewer Employers Offer It?

The percentage of workers eligible for health benefits increased in the past five years despite the fact that slightly fewer employers offered benefits. This suggests that workers are migrating to jobs that offer health coverage.

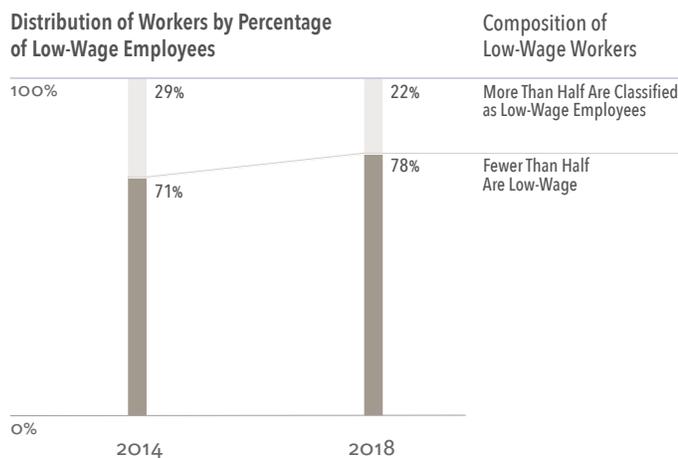

Percentage of Workers Eligible and Employers Offering Health Benefits

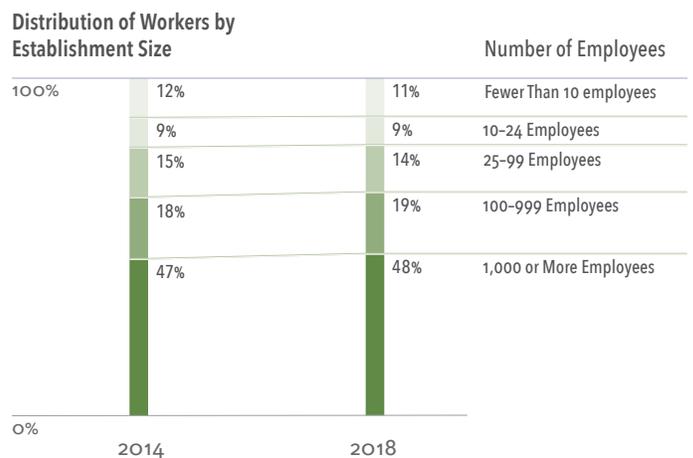

The Share of Full-Time Workers in Organizations Has Increased

Fewer Workers Are Classified as Low-Wage Employees

The Share of Workers at Larger Firms Increased Slightly

SOURCE: Paul Fronstin. "More Workers Eligible for Health Coverage Despite Lack of Growth in Employer Offer Rates," EBRI Issue Brief, no. 487 (Employee Benefit Research Institute, July 25, 2019).

© 2019 EBRI

This report is copyrighted by the Employee Benefit Research Institute (EBRI). You may copy, print, or download this report solely for personal and noncommercial use, provided that all hard copies retain any and all copyright and other applicable notices contained therein, and you may cite or quote small portions of the report provided that you do so verbatim and with proper citation. Any use beyond the scope of the foregoing requires EBRI's prior express permission. For permissions, please contact EBRI at permissions@ebri.org.